

About Clinton Ober

Clint Ober was raised on a Montana farm. At age 15, he had to drop out of school when his father died of leukemia and, as the oldest of five children, he had to oversee the daily business of attending to crops and livestock. He was exposed to the Native American culture and developed a love of Nature and the connection to the natural world.

As a young man, Mr. Ober entered the fledgling cable TV industry in the 1960s, going door-to-door to sell the concept and even climbing up telephone poles to hang cable lines. As the cable TV concept caught on and expanded in the U.S., Mr. Ober formed his own company, Telecrafter Corporation, which eventually became the largest provider of cable marketing and installation services in the U.S. In the 1980s, he turned his attention to the infantile computer industry, and later to the Internet revolution. He partnered with McGraw Hill to acquire live feed distribution rights for the Internet from every wire service in the world. In 1993, at the height of his career and success, he developed an abscess that nearly destroyed his liver and killed him. A long-shot experimental surgery saved his life, and after recovering, he sold his company, gave away his possessions, and set off on a personal journey looking for a higher purpose in life. In 1998, during his travels, he discovered Earthing and has been single-mindedly focused since then to promote the scientific exploration and practical applications for the concept. Mr. Ober has documented his amazing discovery and pursuit of scientific validation in the book, Earthing: The Most Important Health Discovery Ever? (Basic Health Publications, 2010), co-authored with cardiologist Stephen Sinatra and health writer Martin Zucker.

Website: www.earthing.com