

The Declaration of Independence states that "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain un-a-lein-able rights, that among these, are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. The constitution is a body of negative rules that limit the power of government workers and define what the Federal government shall do. The Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States of America, and the Bill of Rights do not tell free men how they shall live, but they do protect each man's right, under God, to be free. So let it be with me, a free inhabitant of the land.
